2021 COUGAR CLASSIC

HISTORY OF YEAMANS HALL

The Tranquility Of An Earlier Time

Upon his death in 1948, the New York Times wrote of Tom Lamont's "unremitting search for the good, the full and the gracious life...a search that was to carry him to all corners of the world" One such destination was the South Carolina Lowcountry when in 1927 he joined the recently formed Yeamans Hall Club. Frederick Law Olmsted Jr. visited the thousand-acre tract twelve years earlier and predicted in a letter dated August 28, 1915, that it could be "an admirable winter resort."

Those who came together to do so ten years later, retained the Olmsted Brothers as well as golf course designer Seth Raynor. Each recognized the beauty of the landscape, with Olmsted writing of its "decided advantages over any existing or prospective winter resort" and Raynor describing it as an opportunity "to create something unique."

As Olmsted went about preparing his General Plan for Yeamans Hall, he began with the premise, "In order to be a success, the initial development ought in my opinion to include one first-class eighteen-hole golf course." As Raynor imagined the course he was to design, he wrote of the beauty of the land that would serve as his canvas: "There is no doubt in my mind," he noted, "about your being able to build a magnificent golf course amid such surroundings... You have a situation here that makes one feel contented."

In design philosophy, each found an ally in founding member and Club architect James Gamble Rogers. Paul Goldberger, recipient of the 1984 Pulitzer Prize for Distinguished Criticism, writes of the Rogers style:

"There was a particular lightness, almost grace, to his best work, especially those building finished before 1930, and a delicacy of scale that distinguishes Roger's buildings...They are understated, never overbearing...All of Roger's major work is magnificently, even brilliantly, detailed, but it possesses a modesty of scale that exudes a sense of deference and good manners...To him architecture was a matter of cultivation, of education, of propriety and of manners..."

The 1924 Olmsted Brothers master plan for Yeamans Hall called for 255 private cottages, two golf courses, talking trails, tennis courts, trap shooting, fields, horseback riding, and boating, but the Great Depression changed that vision forever. The lasting impact of these changed economic times on the original design for Yeamans Hall is described by John de St. Jorre in Legendary Golf Clubs of the American East:

"The ambitious plan to build 250 houses and another golf course came to an abrupt halt with the Wall Street crash of 1929 and the onset of the Depression and only thirty-five houses were ever built... This was the true genesis of the present-day club; the Depression, followed by the Second World War, effectively killed the grand vision of a large multipurpose winter resort...The Club stayed small, remained focused on golf and zealously guarded its private persona in its little known woodland haven."

Yeamans remains a winter retreat with some accommodation given the changes that came with time. The Club season is a bit longer now than winter would suggest with an opening around the first of October and activities coming to a close at the beginning of May. The membership at January 1, 1934 stood at 162 of whom 101 listed their address as New York City, with New Haven and Boston placed second and third with thirteen members between them. Members from nearby Charleston numbered two. The membership eighty years later stood at 290, of whom 40 percent were from north of the Mason-Dixon Line and a like number from the Carolinas. As membership has grown, so too has the Club's geographic reach. While most continue to reside on the east coast, members may be found in Chicago, Dallas, Houston, San Francisco, Toronto, London, Prague, and Switzerland. Amidst such changes, a constant which succeeding generations have retained is a commitment to the spirit of the place. If those who visited in 1925 returned to Yeamans Hall today, they would find comfort. The cottages are those they built and visited. The grounds are those they nurtured and enjoyed. The golf course, through many changes over nearly a century, is once again the one they knew and played. In short, they and all who have followed ever since would feel right at home back within the gates of Yeamans Hall.

COURSE ARCHITECT SETH RAYNOR

The career of Seth Raynor has long since emerged from the considerable shadow of his mentor Charles Blair Macdonald. A Princeton graduate and a civil engineer by training, Seth Raynor had his first association with C.B. Macdonald in 1908, when he was retained to survey the property and then given the further opportunity to supervise construction of the course that would become the National Golf Links.

Macdonald was greatly impressed with his young colleague's work and a professional relationship of almost 20 years followed. In his book, Scotland's Gift: How America Discovered Golf, Macdonald describes how important Raynor's personal and professional qualities were to him. "...it was imperative I secure an associate, one well-educated with wide engineering capabilities, including surveying, companionable, with a fine sense of humor, but above all, earnest and ideally honorable. Such a man I found in Seth J. Raynor."

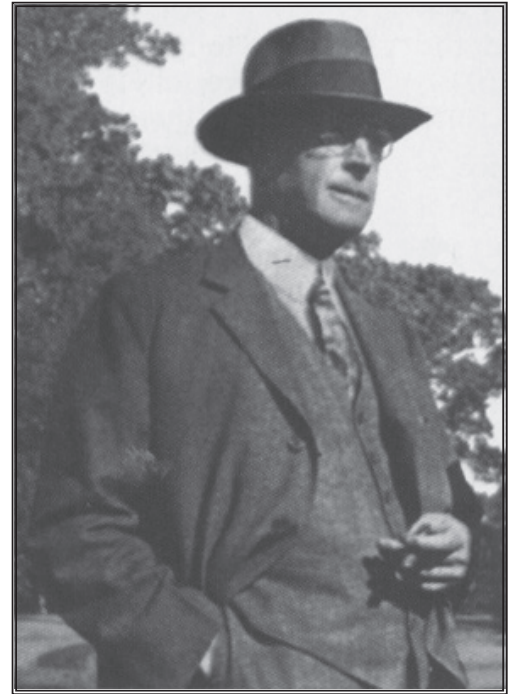

In 1915, Macdonald invited Raynor to become his partner leading to a collaboration on many courses beyond the National including Mid Ocean, Piping Rock, Yale, the Old White, and the Greenbrier. Raynor also pursued a distinguished career in his own right. From 1915 until his death, Raynor designed or remodeled nearly 100 courses. Fishers Island Golf Club, Shoreacres, and Camargo are several of his individual designs. His work may be found in 16 states and extends from Hawaii to Bermuda.

At the height of his career, Seth Raynor designed both Yeamans Hall and the Country Club of Charleston. When working at Yeamans, Raynor collaborated with the Olmsted Brothers firm, which was responsible for the landscape design, and James Gamble Rogers, the architect of the Club buildings and seven of the private cottages. The definitive biography of James Gamble Rogers describes his architectural style, but it equally describes the design principles employed by Frederick Law Olmsted, Jr. and Seth Raynor in their design philosophy.

"He designed what worked, so long as it was within a broad vocabulary of precedent. To him architecture was a matter of cultivation, of education, of propriety, and of manners. He was no more interested in inventing a new style of building than he was in inventing a new way to dress or a new way to set the dinner table. He believed that the modes that had been handed down by previous generations were not only acceptable, but preferable to anything his generation might invent, and that as an architect, it was as much his duty to speak the language that had been bequeathed him as it was his duty as a dinner guest to speak the language of his hostess."

Raynor's career reflects an equal respect for the great traditions of golf architecture. The late golf historian George Bahto wrote of Raynor: "While other architects of the era were adept at self-promotion, and often penned books and magazine articles on the subject, Raynor felt no need to express himself beyond the courses he built. He never sought to reinvent golf architecture, but instead honored the past by anchoring his work firmly in time-honored themes. Like a great symphony conductor, Raynor's masterful interpretations of classic compositions were ever new and ever fresh, yet grounded firmly in timeless genius."

Many of the holes at Yeamans are reminiscent of the best principles handed down by previous generations of golf architects. Raynor likened his design of several of the holes at Yeamans to those found at the great courses of his time, including the National, Piping Rock, the Old White, North Berwick, Prestwick, and St. Andrews. The Raynor philosophy attempted to both incorporate and improve upon the great designs from all over the world. Yeamans Hall is an example of his success in achieving this goal.
